

Voice over IP is merely another application of the internet. Internet access is close enough to a commodity where it would be very hard for one company to dominate the industry. Adding regulations to VoIP only serves the regulators and the few companies already offering VoIP services (by setting up more barriers for competitors to enter the market). Hooking a telephone up to the internet is no different than hooking a computer up to the internet and should never be regulated.